DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (If known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The small country church was built in the newly founded Severn Parish in 1842. It is made of brick, laid up in common bond, and has a moderately pitched A-roof which has now been covered with asphalt shingle. The body of the church is a simple rectangle with three narrow, flatarched windows on each side, and an archcapped chimney above each corner of the roof. The entrance, on the east end, facing the road, is covered by an open porch with a steeply pitched shed roof. The turned, wooded columns rest on a low brick wall and are joined below the roof by wooden panels cut with trefoil pattern openings. Until recently the belfry stood on an open frame above the porch roof. It has been removed and is standing in the church yard. The window on either side of the entrance is set in a round arched bay but has the same flat arched opening and sash design as the side windows. Attached to the west end of the building is the chancel which has a lower roof and is not as wide as the rest of the church. There are three stained glass windows in its west wall. The brick work on this wall extends out at either end to buttress-like projections which give the building a very squat appearance. The parish house, built in 1898, is joined by a colomade the north side of the church. It is a small hip-roofed brick building with a pedimented entry porch on its east side.
